Pulling the Wishbone.

She was a long time with thinking. What her wish should be. He almost grew impatient. So long considered she.

For she had many wishes. And he had only one. It took him but a moment to get his wish done.

But, by and by they pulled it. And Fortune was his friend. He was a happy mortal. For he had the longest end.

But she was not unlucky. For when the reckoning came it somehow dawned upon them that they had wished the same.

—Mary M. Currier.

Women in Athletics.

Women have one advantage over men when it comes to the question of outer dress, says a writer in an Eastern paper. This was clearly shown by a conversation between two girls who watched the new arrival walk down the steps of the hotel toward the golf links. They realize themselves that they are not compelled to be up to the physical standard exacted for the men before they assume athletic garb. "Look at that poor, mistaken, misguided man," said one of the girls as his rather globular figure receded from view. "He thinks that an outing shirt and a pair of knickerbockers make him look just as athletic and sportsmanlike as the best of the young fellows down here. He thinks that it depends only on the clothes. I've seen many a man come down here, look at the tanned, athletic, muscular men who spend their time in sport and the open and decide that they'll look like that themselves. So they go to town and buy the togs which they think are responsible for that look. They don't seem to know that the make-up is really the smallest part of the whole matter. The clean-cut, lithe figures and the generally sportsmanlike look of the young fellows depend on something far more essential than the clothes they wear. It is the result of some years of exercise and active athletic life, and the fat men can never expect to acquire it merely because they have a coat of tan and a lot of outing togs from town. But to judge from their self-conscious manner they go about their appearance in quite as satisfied a manner as if they were the genuine article in place of a futile imitation."

"Now we girls have the better of them, for nothing is necessary for us to look completely sporting beyond a little sunburn and the necessary clothes. So long as we have those two characteristics, we can look as athletic as the most famous golf champion in the country. We don't need the real strength and muscle that the expensive clothes and the necessary exercise of the shirt waist doesn't reveal a girl's lack of muscle unless she is dreadfully fat. We can assume the most athletic looking appearance along with the clothes, and in that particular we are far ahead of the men. Anybody can tell when they are genuine or only imitation, it makes no difference how many clothes they may put on."

When "Miss Summer" Comes Home.

New York Tribune.

Other things, too, the returned summer girl will be obliged to discard. The young man who served "well enough" as a cavalier in the summer hotel may chance to be "impossible" in town. He has romped in the water with the summer girl and carried her basket when they went picnicking, and quoted poetry to her in the moonlight, and he thinks he can do the same, with necessary allowance for city customs, when they come back to town. So he calls promptly, prepared to greet and be greeted with the gay informality of the mountain or seashore, and then his enlightenment begins. The first time Miss Summer is "not at home." If the fatuous youth should call again, woe to him! She goes down with a freezing dysentery that makes him feel that winter is far in advance of schedule time, gives him the tips of lifeless fingers and says: "Ah, no, it's not June yet." "June?" in a voice devoid of feeling, and adds: "How exceedingly good of you to look me up! One never expects to meet one's summer acquaintances again, you know." In a tone that makes him wish that he had drowned in the kindly summer sea rather than live to be the miserable exception.

Miss Summer obviously and ostentatiously makes no effort to entertain. The silences are frequent and prolonged to agony, until poor young June, after five minutes that seem like an hour, rises to go. "Charming to have seen you," she repeats as she might have said "It may rain next week." He bows himself out with murder in his heart, and she goes to her room with a relieved, "Thank goodness, he is settled. The idea of his ever coming!"

Social Amusements.

Detroit Free Press.

"Speak? Why, I never see her when we pass on the same sidewalk. I can condone many things, but never a mercenary spirit. Never!" and the sprightly little matron who boasts that she was born in Detroit and had ancestors on the Mayflower when she landed gave the exclamation in a way suggestive of a rifle shot.

"She gave a card party, don't you see? Her husband is rich, and she was sure that the prizes would be elegant. I never played so in my life. I was all wrought up and studied every move before I made it. She told me half a dozen times that, being hostess, she was only striving for the booby prize, and she made plays that drove her partners to distraction."

"Nothing serious in that," snapped the aunt in corkscrew curls.

"That shows what you know about it. I was the first prize in the card party, and the booby. Mine was worth about 75 cents and hers not less than $10. What do you think of that? And she was the one who said that she took her back and got her money. Think I'd speak to her now? Not I!"

"Did you look into that flap pocket of the silk pouch in the 'grave' you?" asked the aunt.

"Didn't see any flap. Didn't see any pocket. It was the most beautiful prize anybody ever gave."

"I saw and looked inside. It holds one of the prettiest diamond stick pins I ever saw."

"Goodness! I'm going right over now and see if I can't make a darling." I always did say that she was a darling."
